Context Software looked pretty interesting (I just took a look). However, as a "Web Only" company, I am troubled that there is no identification of who this is or where they are. Apparently there has been an active effort to ensure no information appears on their web site. When I followed the registries I wound up on a web site selling car insurance and plane tickets – plus a popup with a good-looking and well endowed screen saver offered for free (Gessner.com).

Based on various writing errors on this web site, including mis-spelling the company name, I guess this company may be out of The country. It's too bad some small developers don't just set up their own web sites, identify themselves, and avoid the web of irrelevant sites.

Still, the product looks like it has something to offer – it will just take more caution to deal with.

I haven't a clue where they are located, but after messing around with the demo and getting immediate replies from Michael while testing, I took the plunge.

While some may give good pre-sales support and ignore you after the sale, Michael has continued to be right on top of things and given excellent support since.

I would invite you to contact Michael directly and ask him where he is located, it's probably not a secret. Their email address is on the bottom of every page on their site.
