

Re: Documentation

Source: <http://coding.derkeiler.com/Archive/Lisp/comp.lang.lisp/2003-10/0300.html>

From: Rayiner Hashem (heliosc_at_mindspring.com)

Date: 10/04/03

Date: 4 Oct 2003 11:52:42 -0700

> *I'd recommend LaTeX. It's easy enough to get started using, and > waaaaaaaay better than XML. TeX's syntax is odd, but XML managed to > out-crap it by a few orders of magnitude. If you want to include code > in your docs, use noweb (a lit programming tool). Using various > tools, you can produce hyperlinked PDFs, and html.

Cool.

> *Oh, you're talking about that level of documentation? It's easy > enough to write a loop and calls to DOCUMENTATION, to pull this out of > an image, and dump it to a skeleton in whatever system you choose.
> Use noweb.*

Like like to have documentation at both levels. I find little point in documenting tiny details in the high-level docs, which can easily get out of sync, and don't like to put high level stuff in the comments themselves, because that's a really poor medium for writing.